

AUGUST 2021

Message from the Director of Golf

Rick Price, PGA

For decades, The Views Golf has overseeded fairways with ryegrass each fall. We have been on a program to skip multiple holes each season, and last year, we were unable to overseed any holes within 50 yards of the green surrounds because of the new turf. We also did not overseed the par 3's and the driving range tee.

Unfortunately, overseeding fairways has serious consequences for year-round playability. In the fall, courses are wet and soft for weeks and carts are restricted to paths as the overseed establishes. During winter, courses face increased weed issues. In spring and early summer, fairway playing conditions can be very inconsistent as the bermudagrass struggles to recover from the overseeding process. These playability issues had long been accepted as necessary evils, but a significant shift has occurred in recent years.

Last year, following the greens renovation in the summer, we were still deciding whether or not to skip overseeding because of many reasons. Currently water rates continue to rise, and just recently, we were notified the price of seed has doubled. These increased costs, combined with the many positive reasons to skip overseeding, has led to the decision to forgo overseeding of the fairways this fall/winter. Most of the tees will still be overseeded to allow for divot repair in the winter.

Here are some key points:

1. Health of the bermudagrass base. Skipping overseeding will allow the bermudagrass an entire growing season to re-establish a deep root system. This stress leads to turf decline every June. Skipping overseeding will allow the bermudagrass an entire growing season.
2. No golf course closure during the time of year when the golf course is in best condition when usually closed for overseeding.
3. No cart path restriction from mid-October to November since the fairways will not be wet from watering the overseed.
4. By not overseeding the fairways, the weeds that have contaminated the fairways can be removed. The Poa Annua that appears in the late winter/early spring will be removed with chemicals and a preemergent applied to prevent new Poa plants. The goose grass that appears during the summer will be prevented with a preemergent in the late spring. These processes cannot be performed when overseeded with ryegrass.
5. Fewer frost delays. With the fairways not overseeded, golfers won't have to wait as long for frost to break. Once the sun is up and the tees are ok, golfers can be allowed on the grass.
6. Without mowing, watering, and fertilizing the overseeded ryegrass, the golf course maintenance staff will be able to concentrate on other areas that have been neglected over the years. The traps can be improved, desert areas trimmed, trees trimmed near tee complexes to open up better views, root prune around edges to prevent root competition from desert trees and drainage projects on areas that are chronically wet.
7. Fairways will be swept to remove divots once mowers are finished for the season.
8. Fairways and greens will be painted to appear overseeded.

A growing number of golf courses are skipping overseeding and now painting their fairways green in the winter instead of overseeding.

Painting fairways eliminates the playability issues that come with overseeding and delivers significant resource savings.

Patrick O'Brien has been consulting with golf courses for more than 30 years as a USGA agronomist and has advised many on making the transition to fairway painting.

Painted dormant fairways can provide an excellent playing surface with firm conditions and extra ball roll; however, dormant fairways will also experience some wear and tear from traffic during the winter because the grass is growing slowly, if at all.

The growing use of paints has really been driven by an emphasis on year-round playing conditions and not to close for overseeding.

Painting instead of overseeding fairways would allow us to be at our best in the fall golf season and come out of dormancy faster in the spring, meaning late spring and summer playing conditions are better, too. If some painted fairways are a little worn during the last few weeks of winter dormancy, the improved conditions during the rest of the year more than make up for it.

Lesson Tee

Student of the Game

I often find myself arguing internally if one method of instruction is better than another including my own. Without getting into detail, it has become abundantly clear that the answer is no. Whether it's the PGA of America or the diatribe of videos and teachers preaching on YOUTUBE one missing component is a keen understanding of YOUR individual strengths and limitations.

If we are all in search of truth, then we all can agree that RACE is the most important factor in determining the approach we must take in the golf swing. JUST KIDDING...well sort of. Now that I have your attention. The most fundamental factor is that we are all a part of the HUMAN RACE and as such we are unique. As Arnie would say, "There are 80 million golfers with just as many different bodies, experiences, skill sets, and approaches to the game."

As much time as I have spent reading and studying differing philosophies on these aspects, I can humbly say I am a student of the game/life. The three most overarching areas that must be addressed, as I have observed, is the Mind, the Body, and the marriage of both. In golf and in life it seems that those most willing to stay humble, hungry, and objective have the capacity to grow, learn, and love. The three best tips I have pooled from different authors, mentors, and friends in an attempt to be the best possible student of the game are:

#1 – Be honest. This begins with yourself. Be willing to self-examine with the help of a professional or a camera or a mirror to look at areas you can improve.

#2 – Be purposeful. If “Nothing Changes then Nothing Changes”. Every now and then we get lucky but real change or progress comes from the work not osmosis.

#3 – Forgive. If you are human than mistakes will always be a part of your story. Don’t be too hard on yourself. Allow the mistakes to humbly remind yourself that there is always room to grow.

Keep swinging, Keep learning. Keep smiling. I mean it’s just a game after all, Right!?
